

I'm Tired

¿¿ What are you tired of?

Being alive. Conscious life as a rational being in a world of nontrivial meaning.

Everyday when I wake up: you mean I have to perceive the world with my senses? I have to apply my logos, or my will, my cognition, my mind? I have to comprehend, understand, digest what I perceive and apply value judgements? I have to construct a workable understanding of my world from my perceptions, then determine how best to act? To know, 'how then should we live'? I have to set my will, purpose and direct my mind, decide on my steps, and act? I have to construct my will, then impose it first on my mind, then on my bodily self, and then on the world around me, each, in turn, as my uncontrollable circumstances allow? I have to exercise my will over what I have been given the power to do so? I have to navigate the world, seeking rightness and purpose? I have to actively engage with myself and the world, to act with purpose and in accord with the best that I know? I have to seek and create meaning? I have to make a genuine, bona fide attempt to live as best I know? I have to embody personhood, I have to engage my mind?

Man, I just did that. Yesterday. I have to do it again? It was kinda hard. Do I always have to do that?

1 Man's Search For Meaning

If life has meaning, it has meaning in suffering. If it has no meaning in suffering, it has no meaning. Hope is good, but hope for a better or more pleasant life / circumstance is not meaning nor a good substitute for it. Hope is good, but not sufficient. Hope always dissatisfied must be sufficient.

2 I hope

I hope you feel what is true. I hope you see clearly. I hope your perception is correct or accurate. I hope your feelings inform you and don't control you.
